Intelligence has told a presidential committee to expect "further revolutionary developments" from Soviet natural science besides sputnik because the Soviets are pushing their natural science program so hard.

This advice from Dr. Herbert Scoville, Jr., assistant director of the Central Intelligence Agency, was buttressed with a remarkably timed statement anticipating the Communists' launching of the first earth satellite.

Speaking to President Eisenhower's Committee on Scientists and Engineers on Oct. 4, shortly before the Soviet announcement that day of sputnik's launching, Dr. Scoville was quoted in paraphrased form as saying:

"There has been publicity about the Russian earth satellite. They won't announce anything until they have it up there. It wouldn't surprise us if such an announcement came at any time. We must be prepared for it. They are capable of doing such things."

"There is no question but that the Soviets are capable of great accomplishments both in peacetime and wartime," Dr. Scoville said. "In view of the dynamic drive of their entire scientific program, we must expect further revolutionary developments in addition to the first satellite launching."
